"ANGER"

It has been twenty years since she saved a stranger's life. Twenty years during which her teenage dreams were not fulfilled. Now Beatriz is nearly 40 and spends her days between the building site where she works, her grandma's flower shop, and her nostalgia for the past. Digging through her memories, she finds an image in an old roll film that makes her question the futility of her life, and driven by an impulse, she embarks on a journey that will lead her to Cota, the stranger who she saved.

SYNOPSIS

As she gets closer to him, everything becomes sinister, and like in a nightmare she discovers that Cota is not the kind of person she expected.

Sordid bars, woman abused, a house in ruins, photographs of children and Jesus Christ are all intertwined in a heavy air from a violent past.

Feeling responsible for the destiny that she believes she tore, Beatriz will risk becoming her own nemesis; she not only will have to face the very much real and monstrous nature of Cota, but also her own.

This is an existential journey based on real events.

Anger is a dream-shaped story, a mysterious film illuminated by neon city lights in an endless night and the pale sun of a melancholic past. Atmospheric, beautiful and brutal. Full of expressive and sensory nuances. Hypnotic like a dream. Like a nightmare.

It's the story of a cold woman, almost smileless, but very empathetic to unjust causes, who is capable of leading her impulses to the limit of violence.

A woman who likes to get into trouble, and suffers, suffers a lot for the weaks. Is in her nature. And her growing anger explodes and hints at her dark side but perhaps, her honest one... debating whether or not to kill the monster, and risking becoming one.

The ethical dilemma of this film has roots in the words of a victim of sexual assault who doesn't believe in forgiveness and who accepts that sometimes she has fantasized about killing her attacker. It's an inner debate.

NOTE OF INTENTION

How to kill the monster without becoming the monster?
